

I am writing to encourage the FCC to preserve the rights of broadcasters to use FM translators, and not allow low-power FM to take priority over these FM translators.

I have been a listener of KLOVE for ten years. KLOVE's studios are located in the Sacramento, California area. However, KLOVE broadcasts all over the nation through the use of FM translators.

Although KLOVE is a nation-wide broadcaster, KLOVE works very hard to provide news and other relevant information regarding the local community. As a matter of fact, if a listener were not familiar with the KLOVE studios, it would be easy to would assume they were broadcasting from your own town.

KLOVE provides daily news updates and community calendar information specific to each of the communities it serves. Every day I hear about events occurring in Redding, Chico, Red Bluff, Anderson and many other towns in my area. I find it very useful to hear information about news and events in my own town this is of particular interest to me.

KLOVE provides wholesome music and other programming, without offensive language and obnoxious advertisements. The Redding area is a very conservative, family-oriented region of California and I have many friends whose entire families enjoy KLOVE. If KLOVE were to be replaced by a LPFM station that did not provide the same high-quality, positive, family-oriented programming, it would be a tremendous loss to this community.

KLOVE, through the use of FM translators, serves local communities all over the nation. KLOVE is responsive to my interests and needs, as well as the needs of my community. Please do not allow LPFM to take priority over the ability of KLOVE to use FM translators.
